Pyometria: Therapeutic Alternative to Hysterectomy

by John Allinson

Pyometria is a dreadful disorder that as breeders we hope we never encounter. Veterinarian surgeons will always tell you that the treatment of choice is hysterectomy, and this can be devastating because of its finality. This is more especially the case if the bitch has never had a litter and is genetically and physically a 'quality' bitch. I am so careful with my dogs that I was shocked at letting my daughter's bitch 'Pepsi' out of her kennel 15 days after mating, to find her totally lethargic. An inspection revealed a very severe vaginal discharge, a temperature of 104C -- and my worst nightmare.

I had of course, swabbed this bitch prior to mating and treated her accordingly. Obviously something had reinfected her post mating. My vet was new to me, as we had only just moved. The practice wasn't aware of my experience or qualifications in either dog breeding or pathological analysis. The response was predictable -- we had to spay her. After much discussion we agreed to her hospitalization. An IV drip was started to re-hydrate her and she was put on a combination of Synulox and Baytril. I immediately swabbed her and set the culture going.

Her response was dramatic in her physical signs and she left hospital 48 hours later continuing her antibiotics. The culture revealed a very resistant culture of E coli which was only marginally sensitive to Baytril - resistant to everything else tested on this first occasion. When her antibiotic therapy had stopped, so did her apparent good health. Overnight her temperature shot up again and her discharge restarted. She was rehospitalized, restarting her drip and Baytril. My vet insisted on spaying her. I agreed to sign a consent form but only on the basis that they contact me before commencing the operation and got to work on the bacterial culture again.

This time I tried everything I could get my hands on. I wanted my vet to try prostaglandin therapy but without knowing that we had a good chance of preventing an immediate reinfection which the current antibiotic therapy did not seem able to give. Both my vet and I agreed this was a last chance. The results were encouraging. A fairly new antibiotic -- Marbocyl -- proved to be more efficient in stopping the bacteria growth. My vet acquired some the same day and Pepsi was started on it immediately in place of the Baytril.

Pepsi's condition rapidly improved again and the prostaglandins were administered for 4 days while she remained in hospital. She returned home having lost a huge amount of pus, etc. due to the prostaglandin's contracting the smooth muscle of the uterus in an attempt to clear it of all infectious material. The Marbocyl treatment continued and I took daily swabs to monitor the progress which showed a continual and steady reduction in the amount of bacteria present. After another week, we decided to maintain the Marbocyl treatment up to its maximum 40 days and then keep our fingers crossed. She didn't reinfect!

Due to the pyometria, it was essential to try and get her pregnant at her next season to avoid another pyo which is a high risk. When her season started she also recommenced the Marbocyl which was to last another 40 days. We didn't want to take any chances!

Pepsi produced 3 healthy puppies

Disseminated Mycobacterium avium Complex Infection in Miniature Schnauzer

Written by Errolyn Martin

Reviewed by Henry J. Baker, Professor and Director; Scott-Ritchey Research Center, Susan A. Goodman-Martin MS DVM,

AMSC Health Committee members Kurt Garmaker, Gwen Mulheron, Patty Ledgerwood, & Vera Potiker

Mycobacterium species cause serious infections of humans and animals throughout the world. It is estimated that one-third of the world's human population is infected with Mycobacterium tuberculosis. Interestingly, only half of the people exposed to M. tuberculosis become infected, and only one-tenth of those infected go on to develop clinical disease. There is evidence that genetic factors are important in determining both susceptibility to infection and whether or not there is subsequent development of clinical disease.

Only a few Mycobacterium species produce disease in normal mammals and non-mammalian species. M. tuberculosis and M. bovis (bovine) are pathogenic mycobacteria in mammals, causing infections primarily in humans and cattle respectively. M. leprae causes leprosy in humans. Mycobacterium avium is the scientific name used for avian tuberculosis. It is named avian tuberculosis because the normal host organism is birds (Aves). The M. avium complex (MAC) is a group of mycobacteria that contains potentially pathogenic organisms. The MAC includes M. avium, M. avium subspecies (ssp.) paratuberculosis, and M. intracellulare. These normally non-disease-producing organisms are commonly present in the environment in soil, water and air. These are closely related mycobacteria capable of producing generalized disease in susceptible patients. Susceptibility to this infection in non-natural hosts, such as dogs may be due to a defect in the immune system that would render the affected individual's immune system incapable of mounting an appropriate immune response to the pathogen. Different parts of the immune system are responsible for digesting invaders, producing antibodies, and orchestrating the body's response to viral, fungal, protozoal, and bacterial infections. Often the various components of these systems overlap, but some also have very specific jobs.

M. avium and M. intracellulare are considered potentially harmful in individuals with an inadequate immune system. MAC infection is common in birds, but infection in mammals is uncommon. According to Dr. Craig Greene's book Infectious Diseases of the Dog and Cat 1, MAC infections in dogs and cats have rarely been reported. One published research study² involving experimental exposure of dogs to MAC by various means concluded that dogs possess a natural resistance to infection with MAC.

There are very few case reports of M. avium infection in dogs. These reports are generally concerning individual sporadic cases. There are two reports concerning a total of 5 Basset Hounds, all related by pedigree analysis to a particular dog. There are two reports in the literature of Mycobacterium avium infections in Miniature Schnauzers. One report describes an infection of three litter mates³, the second report describes an individual Schnauzer⁴. All four of these dogs were related by pedigree analysis to a particular dog currently under suspicion of being a genetic source for the potential immune system defect allowing a MAC infection. The three litter mates in the first report were from a litter of five and lived in separate homes from puppy-hood. The other two littermates did not become infected with MAC.

An alarmingly increasing number of Miniature Schnauzers have been diagnosed with generalized MAC infection in the past 6 years. A total of 46 cases of MAC in Miniature Schnauzers have been reported. Most cases are from the U.S. and Canada. Some cases are reported from other countries such as Poland, Newfoundland, Australia, and other parts of Europe. Incidentally, there have been two reported cases of fatal systemic aspergillosis*, an opportunistic fungal infection, in members of the pedigree in question. It is possible that the same or closely related defect could predispose dogs to other types of opportunistic infections.

These recorded cases of MAC infection and now more recently discovered cases in related dogs, prompted an investigation to define a potential immune system defect which would allow infections by this normally non-pathogenic organism. Initial experiments at the Scott-Ritchey Research Center and Auburn University Small Animal Clinic have not yet yielded conclusive proof of a specific genetic defect that would cause a Miniature Schnauzer to be susceptible to this infection. This genetic based theory of immune dysfunction in dogs is based on the following evidence:

1. Veterinary literature indicates that dogs in general are innately resistant to MAC infection. Dogs are exposed to this pathogen in the environment without becoming infected.
2. Veterinary literature² that outlines research of experimental exposure of dogs to is July 20th.

MAC. Results indicate that dogs who were experimentally exposed to MAC via ingestion developed neither generalized nor localized infection.

3. MAC organisms, especially M. avium, are in the environment, in soils and water, and in bird feces, and can remain viable in the environment for at least 2 years. In spite of this seemingly unavoidable exposure risk, the only reported cases of MAC in Miniature Schnauzers trace to a common bitch with the probability that the MAC-susceptibility trait was passed through her offspring.

4. There are 6 litters from which two or more siblings have become affected with disseminated disease. Most of these siblings lived in separate homes.

5. There are 5 stud dogs that have produced two or more affected offspring when bred to two or more different dams.

6. A test-breeding of the son of an affected animal back to his dam, (who was the full sister of the affected dog), produced one male and one female offspring. The female became naturally infected (not experimentally infected) and died from generalized MAC infection at about 1.5 years of age, the male is currently about 3.5 years old and still apparently healthy. The two offspring were housed together and exposed to the same environment for their entire lives. The offspring lived in the same environment as the parents until the age of 6 months. Both parents of this litter are still living, and healthy. The dam is over 8 years old and the sire is about 6 years old.

7. Two pedigrees that trace to the bitch in item 3 also suggest the defect may be present in low frequency in other parts of the breed population, due to common ancestry.

Based on statistical analysis of the genetic pedigree and results of very limited test-breeding, a potential immune system defect appears to be inherited as a simple autosomal recessive disorder or possibly, a polygenic recessive mode of inheritance. An X-linked mode of inheritance has been ruled out due to the almost equal representation of both sexes. A dominant mode of inheritance is unlikely, as the vast majority of parents of affected dogs were not themselves affected.

The primary clinical sign of MAC infection is lymph node enlargement. The organism also infiltrates the lymph system affecting the liver and spleen, resulting in liver and spleen enlargement. Lymph nodes, bone marrow, and other organs become infected as well. The more common causes of generalized lymph node enlargement such as lymphoma may result in a missed diagnosis of Mycobacterial infection unless a lymph node biopsy is performed with identification of an acid-fast stain characteristic of Mycobacterial infection. If a diagnosis of mycobacteriosis is obtained, a sample should be cultured and evaluated to determine the exact pathogen present. General symptoms that may not be observed in all cases include lethargy, vomiting, lack of appetite, fever, not eating, lameness, blood in the stool, diarrhea, pale mucous membranes, and abdominal distension. Once the infection is established in a dog, it is always fatal. There has been no reported case of remission of a MAC-infected dog. Some dogs perish within weeks of diagnosis, a very few have undergone multi-drug treatment protocols and lived for another few months or even over a year. Thus far, all animals that have been infected have eventually perished from the disease.

There are myths that associate MAC infections with an animal's coat color, allergic conditions, and reproductive status. Affected dogs have been of both sexes, and both salt/pepper and black/silver coat color. Some affected animals have had allergic processes and some have not. Some have been intact show dogs and some have been spayed/neutered companion dogs. None of the affected animals were reported to have had a previous chronic illness.

MAC is potentially infectious for humans, but to date no recorded cases of a human contracting this infection from an affected dog have been reported. Healthy individuals are probably not at risk, because humans generally have the same innate immunity to this pathogen as dogs are thought to possess. Persons with HIV/AIDS, Diabetes, Cancer, or other immune-compromising conditions, and very young children, and elderly individuals should consult with their doctor if they have had a dog diagnosed with MAC or they are considering pursuing medical treatment for a MAC-infected dog. Although antibiotic resistance has not been reported for this type of Mycobacterial infection, it is a very serious problem with M. tuberculosis in humans and can be a risk factor for humans infected with MAC.

Currently a genetics team is working with Miniature Schnauzer DNA provided last year through the efforts of the AMSC Health Committee and the MSC (Canada) Health Committee. This team is evaluating linkage analysis as well as 25 candidate genes, in hopes of isolating and identifying a genetic mutation that may be causing certain Miniature Schnauzers to be predisposed to infection with MAC and other opportunistic pathogens. This work is complex. The relatedness of the dogs whose DNA was provided demonstrates a large degree of homozygosity, which makes elimination of many candidate genes difficult. These dogs have so many genes in common that not as many candidate genes could be ruled out as was initially hoped. More blood samples are needed from confirmed MAC affected dogs, especially those that possibly have a more diverse pedigree background.

Dr. Giger from the University of Pennsylvania is also requesting blood samples from affected Miniature Schnauzers and will be conducting an investigation into this defect. Dr. Giger can be contacted at giger@vet.upenn.edu. To report an affected dog or for more information on submitting blood samples please contact Errolyn Martin, AMSC Health Committee, at 334-703-0166, or email at chattelane@juno.com

62 days later. As I write this article, she is nursing 12 puppies produced after another pregnancy during which she contracted another infection from the same strain of E coli that had caused her pyo. This required 3 courses of Marbocyl to get rid of. Since Pepsis experience, 2 other GSD breeders and 2 breeders of other dogs have used the same strategy. All 4 bitches have recovered from their pyometria and we are awaiting the mating of the first of these bitches in the near future.

Here then we have real hope of successful treatment for 'open' pyo as an alternative to hysterectomy. A few points do need making, however.

- Prostaglandin therapy is painful due to the uterine contractions (and other smooth muscle as well) It is normally short lived, but be prepared for it. Your vet may insist on hospitalisation during this treatment.

- In my tests Marbocyl has been amazingly successful and I have not yet come across any bacteria which are not sensitive to it. It has not been subject to toxicity studies in dogs although tests on rats and rabbits showed no side effects on pregnancy. My 2 litters have been normal to date.

- Marbocyl therapy is limited to a max of 40 days. By the way- Marbocyl is recommended for infectious diseases of the skin and soft tissue as well. It will be interesting to see if it is as successful in other conditions (eg Frunculosis)

- Marbocyl belongs to a group of compounds called Fluoroquinolones. These have been shown to induce erosion of articular cartilage in juvenile dogs and therefore should not be used in young dogs. Therefore your vet may be reticent to use it in certain cases.

Litter and Individual Dog Registrations- Online

You can now registration you litter and your dog "Online ". Litter Registrations were offered in October 2003. Dogs may be registered online whether the litter registration was done online or in the traditional hard copy form. The online process not only speeds and simplifies the registration experience. AT THIS TIME, THE SERVICE IS ONLY OFFERED FOR DOGS WITH SINGLE BREEDERS BEING SOLD TO SINGLE OWNERS. In time it will be expanded to include multiple owners. Here is how it works. The breeder begins the process by registering the litter. When this has been done the new puppy owner can log on to complete the registration process. If the breeder is keeping one of the pups, he/she will follow a few simple steps to register the dog in his/her name. The system can also aid breeders by organizing puppy sale information into an easily printed form suitable for inclusion as part of their record keeping.

After the breeder has completed his part online, the new owner can log on using information from the Dog Registration Application. For information go to www.akc.org.

ed's note...this is fast and efficient and wonderful. The AKC even gets the papers to you in days instead of weeks!

Bred-By Exhibitor Class.

Over 20,000 dogs complete their AKC championships each year but less than 4,000 earn their titles by obtaining all of their points in the Bred-By Exhibitor Class. The AKC/Eukanuba National Championship is a breeder's showcase for AKC registered dogs. Eligibility criteria for entry has been enhanced to include Champions that have earned all of their points from the Bred-By-Exhibitor Class. All dogs completing their championships during the October 8, 2003 to October 5, 2004 qualification period, with all points earned from the Bred-By-Exhibitor Class will be extended an invitation to enter the January 15, 2005 AKC/Eukanuba National Championship Show in Tampa, Florida. As dogs qualify, they will receive the prestigious AKC Bred-by-Exhibitor medallion as well as an invitation to enter the show.

Obituary

Gene Matic

Gene Matic passed away on June 8, 2004. He collapsed on Sunday, March 28, 2004, while doing what he loved — judging Miniature Schnauzers at the Kern County Kennel Club show in Bakersfield, California. Despite emergency surgery, he never regained consciousness.

Gene was born July 9, 1940 in San Juan Rizal, Philippines. He graduated from the University of the East in 1962 with a B.S. in Business Administration. Gene came to the US in 1974 where he worked as a controller or as a finance manager for banks and other companies. His interests, apart from dogs, included cooking and gardening; he raised beautiful orchids and shared them with friends. Gene had two daughters, Mirachelle and Jennifer, born in 1972 and 1974, respectively. Gene was very gregarious when it came to talking about dogs, but sometimes quiet about his private life. Gene did share with all his friends how proud he was of his two lovely daughters and their various accomplishments.

Gene was a past Board member of the AMSC and acted as Specialty Coordinator of the AMSC Specialty shows at Great Western Terriers for a number of years. Gene was also President of the MSC of Southern California for 8 terms, by far the longest serving President in the Club's history.

Gene will be sorely missed by his many friends and by the many dog clubs he helped. Besides his work for AMSC and MSCSC, Gene served as Treasurer of the Kennel Club of Beverly Hills and of the Southern California sporting group club. He ring stewarded for almost every club in the Southern California area and judged matches for most of them before becoming an AKC-licensed judge.

Among the things about Gene that stood out were his desire to learn as much as possible and his generous expenditure of time to pass his knowledge along to others. Most local exhibitors will recall that when Gene was getting started at showing Schnauzers, he would make a practice of setting up next to the best groomers so that he could watch and learn. He would always talk with more experienced exhibitors to get their interpretations of the ideal dog. As he became more experienced, he would invariably take the time to greet and help newcomers. Gene often did not get the credit he deserved for all the work he did because he did it quietly and without being asked. He could often be seen at Great Western moving chairs around as needed, helping to set up the grounds the day before the show, and doing the other tasks that often go unnoticed but help to make shows more enjoyable for exhibitors.

Gene was also extraordinarily generous with his time in helping elderly members of the MSC of Southern California who were having trouble caring for their dogs. Gene would often groom their dogs for them, run errands for them, and generally helping with tasks they could no longer do themselves.

Gene will be sadly missed.
